Modern Goan Short Stories

Mr. Feldon took a long puff at the cigarette meditatively, and blew out the smoke in slow continuous spirals. Then he suddenly got up and moved towards the cupboard, as though something was over-powering him which could only find relief in action.

"Mr. Rego you must be a great reader," said he.

"No, I don't read much. Just a few books that I like."

"I see you read the Bible!" exclaimed Mr. Feldon finding a copy in the cupboard. "And do you play the guitar too?" he asked lighting upon a volume on "How to Play the Spanish Guitar".

"Not much. Just a few chords," replied the artist. "Music and Bible are my chief sources of inspiration."

"Really! I think they are also a great solace for the troubled mind, and the sick heart," said Mr. Feldon. And turning round to the artist, he added with a haunted look in his eyes.

"My purpose in coming here, Mr. Rego, is to ask you to do my portrait. Would you do it?"

"That's my profession."

"I know. And it's a noble profession too. But the portrait I want you to make has to be of an entirely different type and maybe somewhat difficult. But I am prepared to pay your charges—whatever they are."

Alvaro felt intrigued. He did not know whether to take the remark as a compliment or an insult. One portrait could be different from another in point of technique and the colours used. But difficult! What did he mean by that?

"I hear", continued Mr. Feldon, "from a friend of yours and a fellow-painter that you are a creative and most original artist. I've been looking for such a painter, one who is gifted at once with a romantic imagination and a sense of reality."

He looked out pensively, far away, through the open window...
